

December 13, 2013

Gym exclusively for overweight people comes to Canada

An American chain of gyms that accepts only members with at least 50 pounds to lose has opened its first location in Canada. The chain, Downsize Fitness, aims to create a welcoming, stigma-free, community-based environment for people who feel intimidated by mainstream gyms.

“We focus on functional fitness,” says Kishan Shah, president of Downsize Fitness, which also has locations in Illinois and Texas. “Most people are concerned with, ‘Can I get up off the floor? Can I bend down and touch the floor? Can I fit into an airplane seat without a seatbelt extender? Can I keep up with my kids?’ They don’t want to look like bodybuilders.”

Promoting extreme weight loss will not be the focus at the Canadian gym, located in Orléans, Ontario. “It’s based on getting people healthy, and one of the side effects is weight loss,” says Martin Charron, a manager at the new gym.

Three of the four managers at the Orléans gym have themselves lost a considerable amount of weight, and remember how uncomfortable they used to feel in traditional gym settings. Many gyms seem to be built to allow fit people to become fitter, says Charron. It comes as little surprise, then, that people with a lot of weight to lose can feel out of place.

“It’s totally illogical. You go to the gym to get in shape. You don’t lose the weight first so that you walk into the gym and look like everybody else,” says Marc Robert, another manager at the gym.

One major difference between Downsize Fitness and traditional gyms is an emphasis on community. For people hoping to lose 50 pounds or more, and keep it off, a supportive community is essential, according to Downsize managers. The gym hopes to build community through group fitness classes, regular check-ins and social media.

“We encourage members to hang out together, to exchange numbers, go for coffee,” says Robert.

Another factor that can discourage fitness novices in the gym is a lack of knowledge about how to perform exercises. Downsize Fitness aims to ease such concerns by offering modifiable exercise programs with various levels of difficulty, and by avoiding the dreaded drill sergeant approach.

“We make sure that our fitness programming is designed so the newbie that just walked into the door feels extremely comfortable,” says Shah.

Several other companies in Canada also offer fitness services exclusively to overweight patrons, including Fit Zone Plus in Toronto, Ontario, and Body Exchange, which has several locations in British Columbia.

These facilities are likely increasing in number because of the stigma people who are overweight or obese experience when exercising in public. As writer Lindy West describes it, “It’s entering a building where you know that every person inside is working toward the singular goal of not becoming you.”

This sentiment appears to be all too common. On the message boards for the fitness website MyFitnessPal, many people discuss being afraid to run outside or attend a gym because they feel like people are mocking or staring at them.

These fears often start early in life. Many overweight youth shy away from sports or other forms of exercise in public for various reasons, according to a recent review of 15 qualitative studies on barriers to physical activity among overweight and obese adolescents. One of those barriers was the feeling these teens had that their bodies were on display during physical activity or in the change room, making them less likely to actively participate in gym classes. — Catherine Cross, CMAJ

DOI:10.1503/cmaj.109-4682